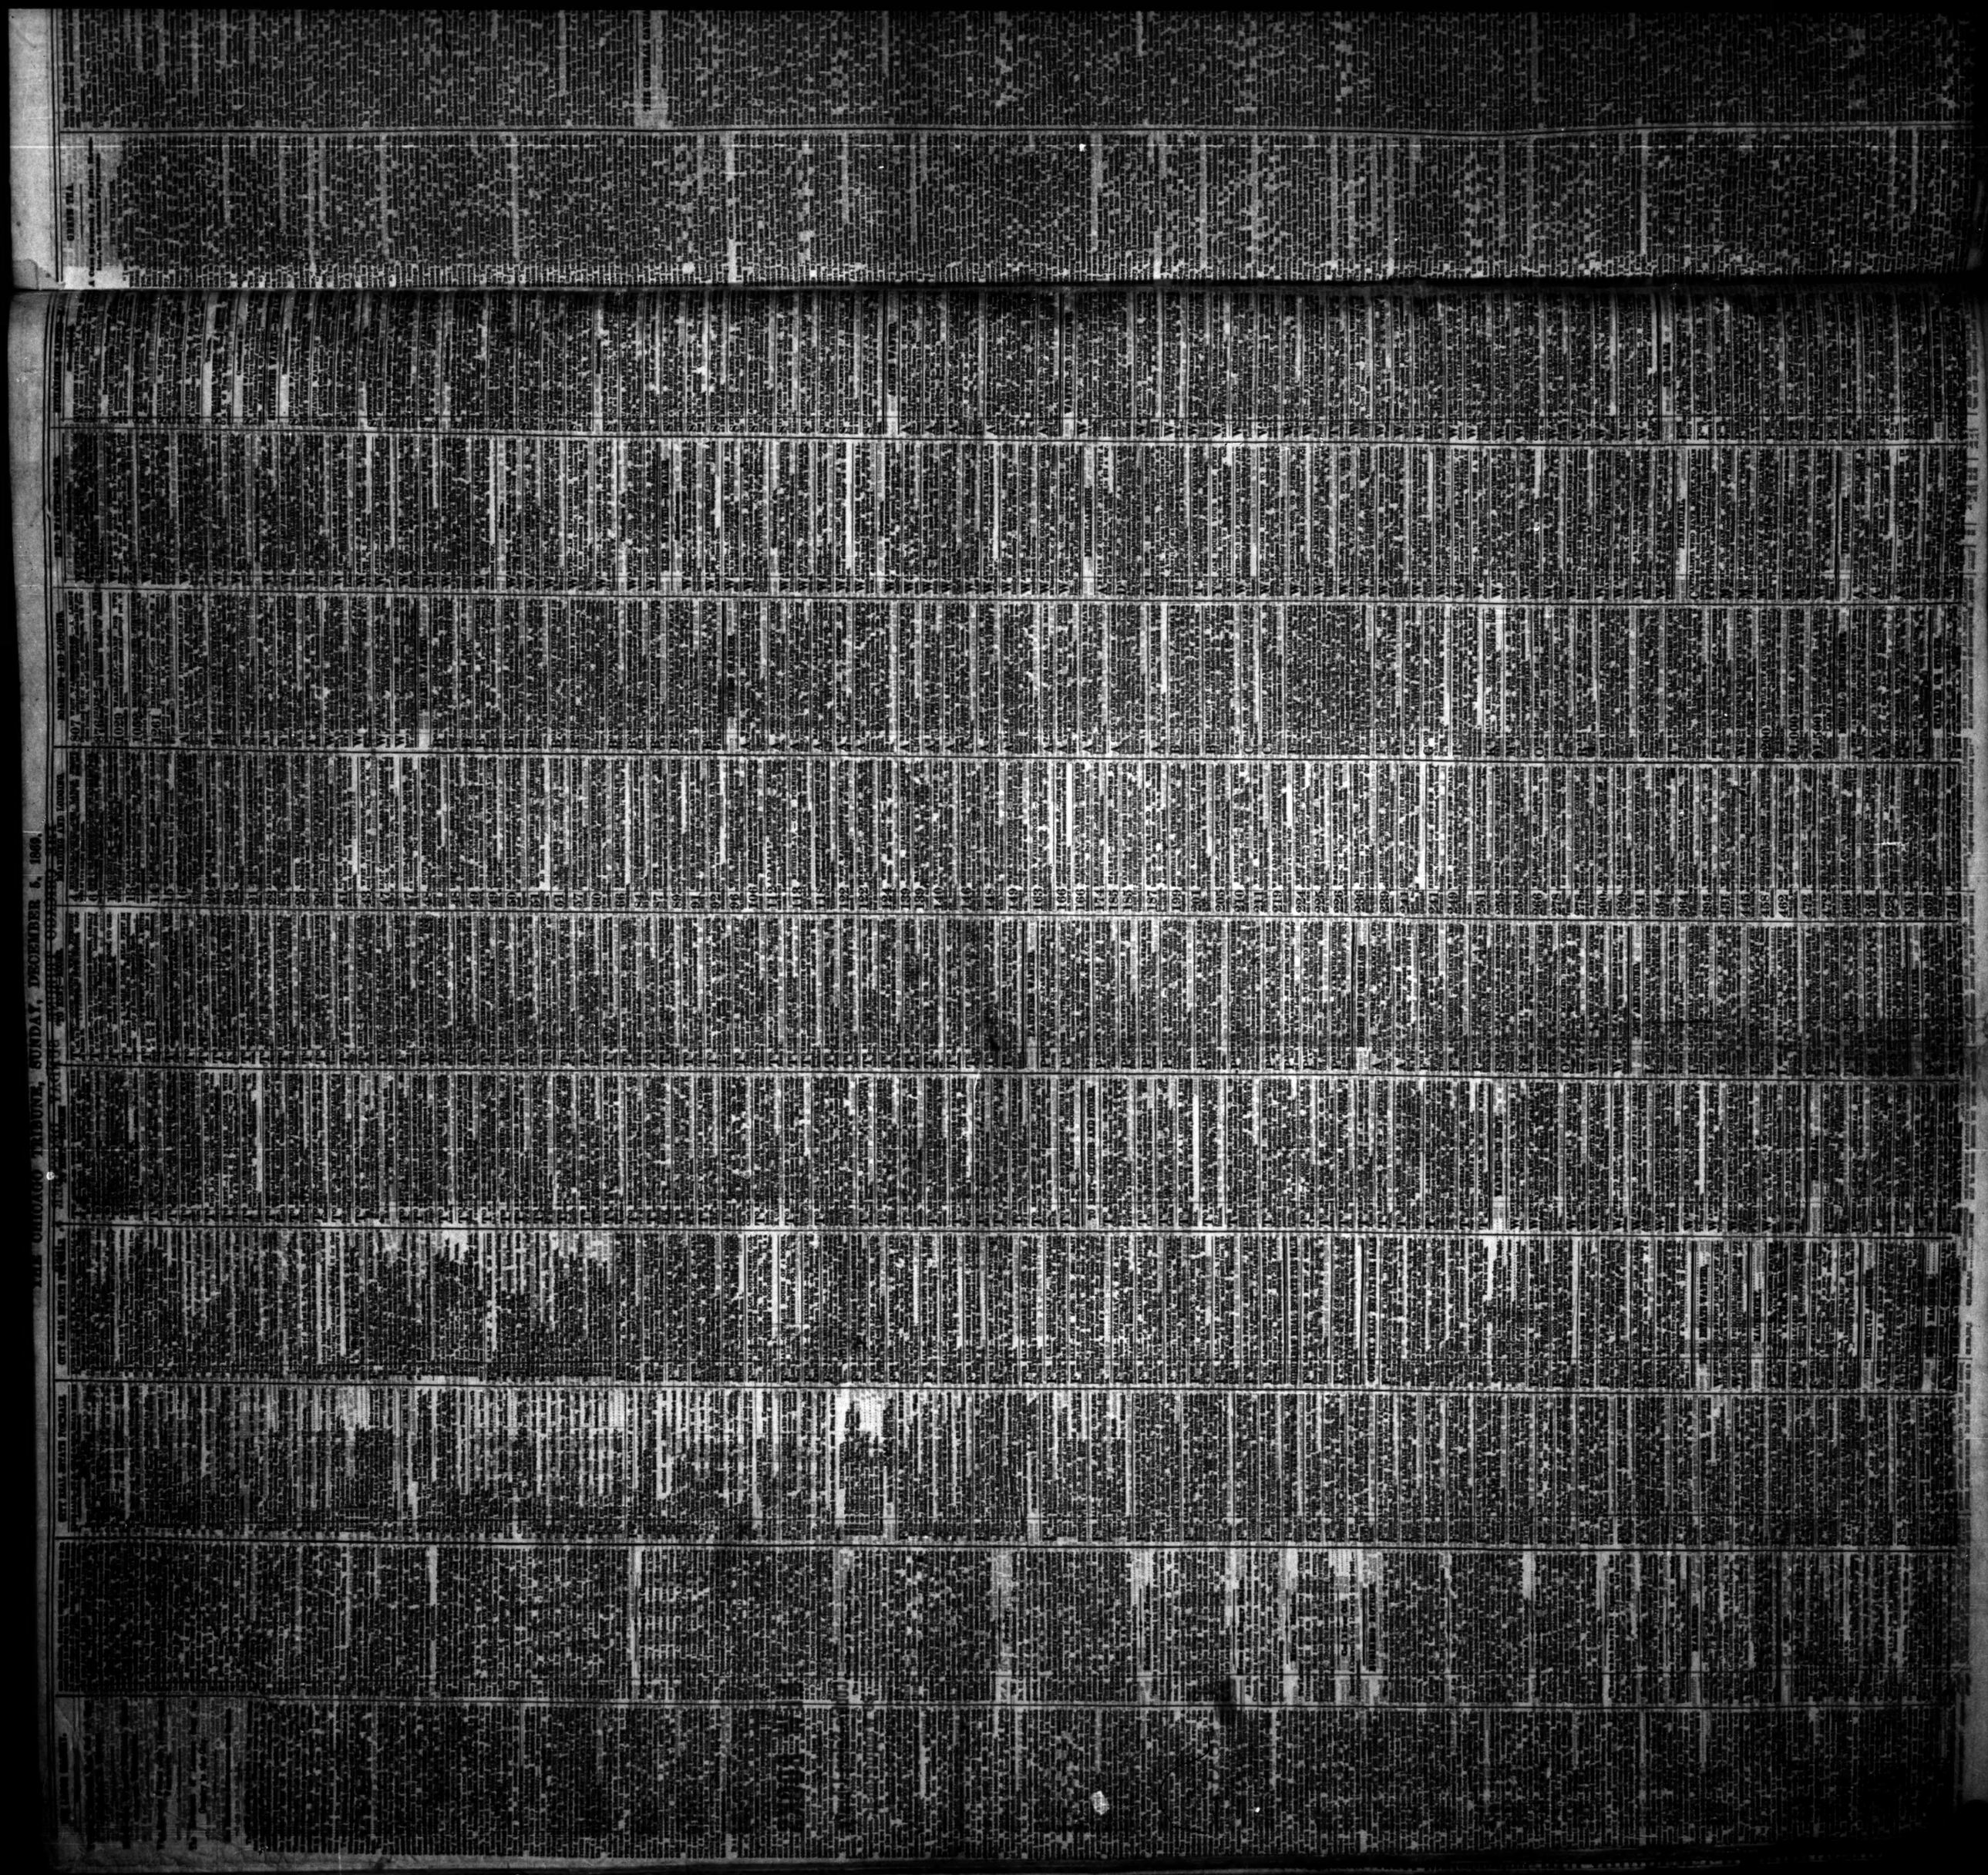
Match Game Between Parker and Sayles.

Parker Victorious by a Score of 1,501 to 1,000—Average, 13 45-77.

A Brilliant and Interesting Game.

A match game of billiards for $500 a side, between Daniel Parker and Frank Sayles, the champion of Canada, was played last night at Crosby's Opera House, before a large audience. The game was the first of a series of three for the championship of the United States and Canada, and the interest in the result was very great. The contestants are well known to the billiard fraternity, and their skill is of a high order. Parker is a native of Canada, and has been considered the champion of the Dominion for a number of years. Sayles is a resident of Boston, and has won the championship of the United States. Each has his partisans, and the betting was quite lively before the game commenced. Parker was the favorite, and could get odds of 10 per cent. The game was played on a four-foot table, with balls 2 1/2 inches in diameter, and was 1,500 points up. The rules governing the game were those adopted by the National Billiard Association, and the referee was Mr. Edward Hoffman, of Boston. The game was called at 7:30 o'clock, and the first inning was made by Parker, who scored 14 points. Sayles followed with 4, and Parker then made 11 more, when Sayles got a chance and made 15 points. Parker then made 10 more, when Sayles got a chance and made 15 points. Parker then made 10 more, when Sayles got a chance and made 15 points. Parker then made 10



GREEN TEA.

A Case Reported by Martin Shortbase, the Eminent Physician.

IN TEN CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I. HOW IT BEGAN.

"I say, Frank, you look rather seedy this morning. Have you been out on the spree?"

"Not a bit of it, Jack. I have been in bed all night, and I feel as if I had been there a week. I have a splitting headache, and my mouth is as dry as a chip. I'm afraid I'm in for a fever."

"Nonsense! Why don't you send for a doctor?"

"Because I don't believe in doctors. I'll be all right in a day or two. I've had a headache before, and I know how to treat it. I'll take a cup of strong green tea, and go to bed early."

"Well, you know your own business best, but I should have thought you had had enough of that sort of thing lately. Why, you've been at it ever since you came back from Europe. You'll be ill if you don't look out."

"Pooh! nonsense! I'm all right. Don't bother me. Good-by. I'll look in on you to-morrow."

"Good-by, then. Take care of yourself."

I left my friend's room, and went down into the street. I had been living for the last few months at the rate of a thousand a year, and I had begun to find that my income was not sufficient for my expenses. I had been to Europe, and had run through a considerable sum of money there, and I had come back to London with the intention of settling down to the steady pursuit of literature. I had taken chambers in the Temple, and had begun to work in earnest. I had published a novel, which, though it had not been a success, had not been a failure, and I had written a number of articles for the magazines, which had been favorably received. I had begun to look upon myself as a rising man, and I had begun to feel that I could afford to indulge in a little extravagance. I had given a dinner-party the night before last, and had asked a number of my friends to meet me at the Star and Garter, Richmond. We had had a very pleasant day, and a very jolly dinner, and had not broken up till the small hours of the morning. I had gone to bed with a splitting headache, and had got up with a splitting headache. I had had a bad night, and I felt very ill and miserable. I had told my friend Jack that I was all right, and that I should be well in a day or two, but I knew that I was not telling the truth. I knew that I was in for a bad attack of illness, and I was very much afraid of the consequences.

I made my way to my chambers, and sent the boy for the tea. I told him to get me a pound of the best green tea that could be procured, and to be sure to get it at once. I had had a cup of tea for breakfast, and had found it very refreshing, and I thought that a few cups of strong tea would be the best thing I could take to relieve my headache. I had never tried green tea before, but I had heard that it was very good for headaches, and I was willing to try anything that promised relief.

CHAPTER II. HOME.

I made him leave the tea-pot on the hob, and told him that I would make the tea myself when I required it. I did not like the idea of being waited on by servants when I was ill. I preferred to be left entirely to myself. I had a horror of being fussed over by women, and I knew that I should be fussed over by Mrs. Jenkins if she had the chance. I therefore told the boy that I should not require his services again that night, and that I should be glad if he would not disturb me unless I rang the bell. I then made myself comfortable on the sofa, and began to think about my symptoms.

First, I thought of my head. It was aching violently, and I felt very sick and giddy. Secondly, I thought of my throat. It was very dry and parched, and I had a great desire to drink. Thirdly, I thought of my eyes. They were very painful, and I could not bear the light. Fourthly, I thought of my limbs. They were very weak, and I felt very tired. Fifthly, I thought of my mind. It was in a state of great confusion. I could not collect my thoughts, and I could not fix my attention on any subject for more than a few minutes. Sixthly, I thought of my pulse. It was very quick and feeble. Seventhly, I thought of my temper. It was very irritable. Eighthly, I thought of my appetite. It was entirely gone. Ninthly, I thought of my tongue. It was very white. Tenthly, I thought of my skin. It was very hot and dry. Eleventhly, I thought of my stomach. It was very much disordered. Twelfthly, I thought of my bowels. They were very much constipated. Thirteenthly, I thought of my liver. It was very much deranged. Fourteenthly, I thought of my kidneys. They were very much deranged. Fifteenthly, I thought of my heart. It was very much deranged. Sixteenthly, I thought of my lungs. They were very much deranged. Seventeenthly, I thought of my blood. It was very much deranged. Eighteenthly, I thought of my nerves. They were very much deranged. Nineteenthly, I thought of my constitution. It was very much deranged. Twentiethly, I thought of my whole system. It was very much deranged.

Having thus thoroughly taken stock of my symptoms, I began to think about the tea. I had had a cup of tea for breakfast, and I had found it very refreshing. I had had a cup of tea for lunch, and I had found it very refreshing. I had had a cup of tea for dinner, and I had found it very refreshing. I had had a cup of tea for supper, and I had found it very refreshing

DARIEN CANAL.

The meager Lopez left our navy yard yesterday for Panama, where he will stand by to see that Cuban sovereignty and the Cuban flag are not insulted in this project. Of course there is the least intention of engaging, at present, in any canal building scheme. The President and Cabinet feel that whatever communication is done this or other is to be made between the Atlantic and Pacific and their action in reference thereto is strengthened by the report of the Navy Canal. They hold, as the Secretary of the Navy says in his report, that we have reached the utmost limit of utility in the survey and discussion of the subject, and that the time has now come for action in the field. The next thing is to carefully examine the whole ground, so as to determine where the canal will be, and, if ever, built. That is all the government proposes to do, and when that has been done Congress must be called on by some way or other to make the appropriation. Whether it will be given to the Atlantic and Pacific and their friends, or to the Panama Railroad, which probably controls it, or to some other party, remains to be seen. I have not a moment's doubt that the Panama Railroad Company, or some of the parties who control it, will be found to be the real parties who will be found to be the real parties who will be found to be the real parties who
